In his "Cicero," Mr. Tunstall, who was formerly principal of the Norfolk was formerly principal of the Norfolk Academy, has shown himself not merely a scholar, but, what is more, a teacher with a vital interest in the needs and weaknesses of his pupils. In this he has not only rendered a timely service, but has proved his right to attack the greatest perhaps of Latin problems—the first year course. This problems—the first year course. This he has done in "The Latin Ladder."

The title of the book is significant. It begins at the bottom, and by easy gradations mounts step by step to the broad plateau whercon the pupil finds Caesar, Labienus and the rest encamped with the legions that fear no foe.

The book is divided into three parts.

Part I. twenty-one chapters, serves to orient the pupil in the field of Latin study. Incidentally, the pupil who masters this part will know how to make a synopsis in the third person of any regular verb for the indica-tive active and passive, besides making much headway in the declensions, learning fifteen fundamental principles of syntax, and acquiring a vocabulary of a hundred and thirty words.

Part II. treats forms and syntax in alternate chapters, the forms in the or-derly sequence of the larger grammars, the syntax in the order of difficulty. The method of treatment for the syntax is unique, and, as we believe, absolutely sound. Questions leading up to the composition work and followed by illustrative sentences in Latin form a catechism on the principles set forth in Part III.

Every fifth chapter in Part II, is a reading lesson. Every seventh chap-ter is followed by a review. The reading lessons (even those in Part I.) consist of continuous narrative. Those in Part II, are based on Viri Romae and the Helvetian War.

Part III. is a capital summary of the syntax in thirty-five pages for refer-ence use in Part II, and to facilitate rapid review work.

The vocabularies have been selected with great care, being based on Professor Lodge's invaluable book, "The Vocabulary of High School Latin."
